FOUR DANCING FEET

BY JANE PHELPS.

LILLY SEES TOM AT THE THEATRE

CHAPTER 51

"I've got something to tell you, Gertrude," Lilly said in an aside after she had introduced her companion as James McGinnis. "I'll tell you after the boys go."

Lilly did not notice that Gertrude was smiling, so taken up was she with McGinnis, a young man she had only met that night, and whom to use her own words, she was "ramping because he had money."

"What is it you have to tell me, Lilly?" Gertrude asked in a tired voice as they stood in the dark hallway after bidding their escorts good night.

"That fellow, Tom Norris, the one who we thought was stuck on you so long ago—he's here again."

"I know, I went riding with him this afternoon."

"You didn't? Why didn't you tell me he was in town? I always tell you everything."

"I didn't know it till this morning, Lilly. Then just a little after he came and took me for a ride."

"Well, I saw him tonight with the sweetest girl! Gee! But she was a peach! You see, McGinnis runs a big pool parlor, he's got money to burn, so Len told me when he introduced him to me. It wasn't two minutes before he asked me to go to a show, and if I couldn't stay all through, said he wouldn't mind but would take me to Rosenberg's in time to dance. Maybe I didn't jump at the chance! We went to that new musical comedy, orchestra seats, mind you, and only just two rows in front of us was that Norris fellow in water's clothes, and a girl without much on but strange, and a gorgeous blue coat to lean against. Honest, Gertrude, she didn't show hardly anything but bare skin above the top of the seat. She was a swell looker, too, lovely blonde hair, done high up on her head, and pearls and rings and bracelets. Oh, gee! Why were we born poor!"

Gertrude heard Lilly's words and word of all this. All she realized was that instead of coming to see her dance in her pretty, new costume Tom had taken some other girl—his own wife, evidently from Lilly's description, to the theatre.

"He's got a right to take anyone he wants to the theatre," her pride came to her rescue, although she desperately wanted to cry. He had said he was going to take her, and now the very first night he had taken another, and everyone said she looked so pretty in her white dress with the nice shoes and stockings.

DAYS GROW SHORT AND SKIRTS LONG

BY ELOISE.

New York is wearing her skirts eight inches from the ground, but they promise to drop even lower than that when winter comes. Even now some of the extreme models are being shown which are ankle and instep length. The first reception and dinner gowns for late summer and early fall are featuring these long skirts. In fact, they are about the only changed feature in the new styles. Belts remain low, hems are long and slender, and blouses are plain. Sleeves of course, still offer a little something unusual either in regard to line or trimming.

This gown design for formal afternoon affairs is made of sheer crepe and is in a gray shade. Gray, by the way, being one of the featured colors for fall, is being used extensively in both gowns and hats. The pointed skirt hangs long and unevenly as it should.

Two mountain lions caught by officials of the federal biological survey will arrive this morning for the Albuquerque zoo—but there is as yet no zoo.

The idea of a city zoo was developed some time ago and the local biological survey officials promised co-operation in securing native animals with which to fill it. But the survey beat the city officials and the city is now useless and will probably have to keep the lions at the water works until this condition is remedied.

Plans for the city zoo have been under consideration for some time and the zoo will be located at one of the parks, probably the Rio Grande park which is not yet a reality.

New Mexico is rich in native animals of many types and could furnish mountain lions, wolves, coyotes, bob cats, deer, several varieties of bear and many other smaller animals. The biological survey has promised its co-operation in securing the animals—if the city will furnish the place to put them.

No fires were experienced during the ten day period on the Carson, Cook, Lincoln, Manzano, Sitgreave and Tonto forests, all of which have been subject to general rains during that period. The total number of fires for the district for the present season is 509.
